Israel's $40,000 primary and high school pupils and kindergarten chil-dren begin the new school year today following the decision of the Teachers Union to call off its threatened strike of grades one, seven and

The central committee of the Histadrut Teachers Union decided in Tel Aviv yesterday afternoon not to go through with the partial strike it had furgatered over the issue of overcrowding in classrooms, after a 90-minute address by Education Min-ister Yigal Allon. Forty of the 53member committee met with Mr. Allon in a four-hour session at the against the strike, three for, with six

JOINT PANEL

The Union accepted Mr. Allon's proposal that a joint committee should examine the entire question of classroom crowding and establish its priority among the problems facing the Ministry. The Union will check what progress the committee has made after two months. In his address to the Union Mr. Allon said that he was surprised not by their opposition to crowded classrooms, but by their threat to strike over the issue. He sald it was his Ministry's intention to reduce from 40 to 35 the number of students in tozar Gligoric, the Yugoslav for it three times previously and classes for pupils requiring special

U.S. diplomat, wife manhandled in Uganda

KAMPALA (Reuter). - The U.S. government is considering warning American tourists not to visit Ugan-da following an incident when Uganda troops allegedly "roughed up" an American diplomat and his wife, diplomatic sources said here yesterday.

The sources said that Mr. Pierre Shostal, newly appointed First Secretary of the U.S. Embassy in Klgali, Rwanda, had been stopped by Ugan-dan troops at the Ugandan-Rwandese border about 10 days ago. His wife, Chantal, was taken to a nearby army camp, but later released. The sources said they were "roughed up seven wounded.

THE DRAGONS IN THE GARDEN

IF one gave names to years according to their outstanding features than this year would be, at least around our place, the Year of the Chameleon. Never in all the years I've been in the Judean Hills have I seen so many of these lovely and interesting creatures I say lovely for though tures. I say lovely for, though not beautiful in the classic sense, their bright colours are true and clear and their form is a thing of wonder.

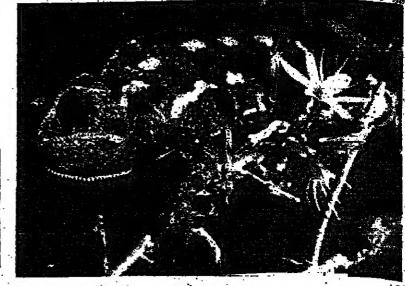

I'll never forget the first chameleon I ever saw, soon after I arrived in Israel for the chameleon is a creature of the Old World and does not exist in America. It was a sunny Yom Kippur in Je-rusalem and I was sitting in the window of a room in the German Colony when suddenly a creature such as I had never seen started to walk along my window-sill. I open-ed the window and brought it inside and sat for several hours in amazement at the 'strange and wonderful beastie." I knew what it was, but only from books.

One reason why they abound in our garden and all around the farm is that we do not spray insecticides. These creatures, living as they do on insects only, are ex-tremely hard hit by sprays, both by eating poisoned insects and by starvation when insect populations are decimated by insecticides. Here in our garden they find plenty to eat and no poisons to harm them.

One of the most interesting encounters I ever had with a chameleon was one October afternoon at the Jerusalem Zoo when, under a pomegra-nate tree, I saw a large female chameleon scrabbling in the stony soil. Her abdomen bulged with eggs and she was intent on her labours, so in-tent that she wasn't even aware of my presence. She prepared a hole and one by one deposited more than a dozen small, round, eggs in it. She then covered it over and packed the soil above her eggs, using her whole body as an aid in tamping it down. All through the winter I waited and in the spring I frequented the pomegranate tree with great regu-larity. I put a fine net over the spot where Mama Chame-leon had hidden her eggs, for I wanted to see how many would hatch I almost gave it up for the weeks went on and no chameleons hatched. Then, on a day late in spring I found six small dragons scratching at my net. I removed them carefully and put them in the tree but, on a hunch, I replaced my net.

a hunch, I replaced my net. Three days later two more hatched, but then no more. I encountered a chameleon once while out mushrooming in January. He was curled up in a hollowed boulder under a spiney bush. He was a vivid green that day and his eyes were open, though he did not move when I picked him up, so deep was he in his hibernation.

HEBREW MEMOIR

In our garden we use the biological fly traps marketed here in Israel as Baal-Zvov but familiar to Americans as Big Stinky. The traps attract the flies by scent and are ex-tremely effective. The chame-leons sit near the fly traps and catch the flies when they land on the lid of the trap or on the foliage nearby. or on the foliage nearby.

It is indeed an amazing thing that so many chameleons do survive when one sees how defenceless they are. They have no teeth nor other fighting equipment, their main defence being their protective colours. ation. RABBI Novogrodsky I'm sure was thankful for the mauve yarmulka his wife had mauve yarmunka his wife had custom-made for him because it managed quite aptly to cover his bald spot that, within the three years I came to know him, engulfed most of his head. Every year I noticed that his wife gave him a new mauve yarmulka the a new mauve yarmulka the exact size of his sparsely cultivated head. In this way Rabbi Novogrodsky managed to keep his youthful appearance intact. By the time the third year rolled around, the yarmulka began very much to resemble the pink tablecloth covering our dining room table at home-Rabbi Novogrodsky had a habit of saying yes while his whole forehead would undu-late back and forth and at times this movement would inadvertently wiggle his ears. This would also happen when he beamed at an intelligent comment he would make. I never saw him wiggle and beam so much as when he raised his two-metre frame from his chair and said to Jeffrey after he fell asleep in class for the third time that "Linnetz, I'll throw you out of the class so fast you'll catch pneumonia from the He beamed so hard that his forehead had a muscular spasm that soon spread to his ears, knocking the table-cloth from his head and revealing to the class for the first time his two well coiffured hairs that were rolled across his head in semicircular piles, giving some re-semblance to a curly head. This conclusion was quickly overtaken when he bent down to pick up his yarmulka. At this point both hairs unrolled themselves to reach the floor in a Rumpelstiltskin manner,

She was slightly overdeveloped for a girl of 13 and she proudly pushed her young breasts forward as if she were competing for a prize at a B'nai B'rith bazaar. I could never touch her while sitting in the back of the class because I would see her face and in-advertently look upon the mole on the right side of her lip, which was about the same size

It was with a flushed face that Richard made his reply, as his left hand was stuck in the entanglements of Malka's bra, and it was only with a great effort that he succeeded in unravelling his hand from the medieval workings of such a complex accessory. With his hand came huge bits of cotton and at the the Palai terms of the palai terms. this the Rabbi beamed, this time wriggling his forehead in a more exotic fashion, accompanied by a nervous twitch that would occur every second undulation of his forehead. amidst Malka's tears that "Jesus Christ had absolutely no purpose coming to earth. While walking on the clouds one day he slipped and fell and, although he landed on earth, he thought he was in hell. He knew that he wouldn't be able to get any help from his father. He figured that he would be so good and so kind that everyone in hell would be repulsed and throw him out and send him back to heaven on a huge pair of teats which was the mode of travel in lustful hell. So you see Jesus never knew he was on Earth." Rabbi Novogrodsky looked at Reuven, then at Shlomo, and back and forth again until his eyes looked like the re-volving fruits on a slot machine, and in this condition they rested on me. He eyed me strangely for a while and I smiled at him. He began to speak, thought a little while longer and dismissed the class.

* * * I HAD practised my Haftara for several days and still didn't know how to sing it. The rabbi coached me until my voice cracked, which it did every third word or so. The problem, I think, was that I didn't know what the words meant. I had always thought it foolish to learn how to read but not learn what it was that you were reading. The singing of the Haftara sounded so much like a rock 'n roll song called "In the Jungle" that my voice took on a rock quality, much to the dissatisfaction of the rabbi.

The rabbi's office where I took my Bar-Mitzva lessons was small, about the size of a large bathroom. The ar-rangement of the room made it seem much smaller though. There were pictures of 10 generations of rabbis hanging on one wall, the tenth being Rabbi Novogrodsky. All but one of the 10 pictures were surrounded by the aura of holiness and revolution, the exception being the tenth. It did not transcend any earthly reality. Its juxtaposition to the rest created the appearance of a diamond, perfect but for one flaw — its tenth face. And that characterized Jacob Novogrodsky, the last Novogrodsky to carry on the family heritage. He would rather have been a plumber than a rabbi, and his huge frame a rabbi, and his huge frame and large, thick calloused hands attested to this fact His destiny was like that of a trolley car always to travel on its selfsame track without any possibility of cutting a new path. His destiny was not his own.

SOOT

The floor I think was of marble, but the layer of dust and soot from the factory across the street hid its harsh complexion from my eyes. The library of haphazardly stacked books made the room look still smaller. The soot also covered the library, giving an added comfort to nine of the 10 pictures.

The rabbi sat uncomfortably in his chair which was too small for his overly large mahogany desk, barren of any trappings to give it meaning. It was sandwiched between the side of the desk and one corner of the room. The books were alive and swallowed our already stale words, discontinuing all communication be-

It was the day of my Bar-Mitzva, May 18. All my relatives and friends assembled inside the synagogue which was simple in design, bran-dishing its seven new stainedglass windows acquired 23 years before. To people reading from law books 3,000 years old, 23 years is but a minuscule fraction, and could be considered new. The 14 pews arranged horizontally facing the ark which contained the three Tora scrolls were enough to accommodate the hundred or so people who were to attend the services there that day. I got top bil-lig for the day and my name was on a placard encased in glass reading:

Bar Mitzva today 9 am JOS

My name was askew but it was a simple temple, built on pillars, the left corner one being 5 feet higher than the right corner pillar, making everyone inside the temple look as if they were standing on an angle. The angling of my name gave a harmonious rapport to this type of sachitecture.

In air attempt to modernize the temple, a microphone was attached to the podium where the Haftara is read, giving it the elegance of a run-down night club where once important singers who no longer had the stuff would sing. This made me feel at ease. It was 9 a.m. and the procession was starting Rabbi Novogrodsky in his Sabbath suit of dark grey introduced suit of dark grey introduced me to the congregation as the Bar-Mitzva boy of the week. The way he said it made me feel as if I had won an award of some kind. Many prayers were said (I was hoping for my henefit) and the rabbi motioned me forward. I looked nervously at my father, who in a facial contortion similar to that of the Rabbi's but ending in a broad smile, beamingly led me to the podium, as was the duty and pleasure of the Bar-Mitzva boy's father. He then sat down and I remember wishing I could sit with him or let him could sit with him or let him read my Haftara. Shlomo and Reuven smiled at me from the first pew and I tried not to look at them, as I was sure they would try and make me

My suit was a black shiny mohair and it fit my thin lanky frame nicely. It wasn't like the other suits I had tried on I think it was made tried on. I think it was made by accident. But I was at the age where an accident of this sort was greatly appreciated. My arms were too long for my torso and my torso too big for my legs. I found com-fort in this suit. It, too, must have been 13 years old, for it had the same problems I did. My new blue shirt was very stiff on me but reflected my blue eyes nicely. My blonde hair was parted simply on the side and my pompidour increased my height almost eight centimetres. I looked at the congregation in front of me not knowing who many of them were, but smiling very hard because I was told these strangers would give me money as a gift, and I wanted them to feel close to me so they would have no inhibitions in approaching me later that day.

My eyes scanned the congregation, my father's smile growing impatient, telling me to start my Haftara. Reuven and Shlomo were still smiling so hard that if they kept it up for a minute more their faces would surely break. They had marked their Bar-Mitzva two weeks before and I envied them greatly. The rabbi undu-lated his forehead expectantly towards me.

and my hands were sweating.

I knew I still hadn't mastered my Haftard. It was seven pages long. Shlomo and Reuven's was only four. I really did envy them. I was doing fine until page five, and it would have been over if I had been Bar-mitzva two weeks earlier. On page six what I had feared for the last few weeks happened. I began sing ing my Haftara to the tune of 'In the Jungle, the Mighty Jungle, the Lion Sleeps Tonight."

My father's smile was like

Some of Kurzweil's essays will undoubtedly remain classics of their kind. In an essay on Ahad Ha'am published at the same time he inveighed against that author's facile synthesis of Judaism with the outworn rationalisms of the 19th century. A whole generation had allowed itself to be deluded by a pseudo-religion which was little more than a sop for secularists. After Kurzweil's essay no one will be able to read Ahad Ha'am again in quite the same innocent way.

Kurzweil's acid intellect and his impatience with the methods of the older makilim (as well as with young innovators who had nothing to innovate) earned him many enemies. Perhaps for this reason he was not offered regular academic employment at the Hebrew University when he first arrived in this country. As a consequence he spent several years teaching in a high school in Haifa before an opporment of America's first wholly

It is left to others to build the good society, but first we need the critics to clear the ground of the accumulated debris of false opinions and delusions. It is this task which Kurzweil carried out so splendidly in a brilliant and tempestuous career.

IMPLICATIONS

Now, while this approach may be right as far as it goes, one should be clear about its implications, especially for this country. Hitherto, national insurance has been one of our major saving instruments. But stically or pessimistically. Ba- but not so much in the case of a if no reserves need be accumulated, it will cease to be so. Since If that source dries up, either sav-ings will have to be stepped up in sums we can set aside for social deposits all its reserves with the Government. In the current fiscal year, the Government expects to be lent IL820m. by the Institute. while it plans to contribute to the Institute only IL190m. The difference — IL630m. — is almost one-third of this year's Development Budget.

Another consequence of a change in the current spending basis will be that no proper yardstick will be available for comparing the Institute's actual revenue and commitments. We may therefore be in for some unpleasant surprises. Once we abandon the principle that commitments extending into an indefinite future must be held within the prospective — i.e. actuarial — revenue, the expansion of these commitments will be difficult to check. As a matter of fact, some of the National Insurance branches (maternity, industrial accidents of selfemployed persons) have already been operating in the red, but this is not serious as long as the Institute has enough reserve funds to help

At the Israel Electric Corporation, soaring pension payments have been one of the causes of higher electricity rates, though the public is not really aware of that. At the National Insurance the issue could easily assume major propor tions.

Incidentally, there is reason to believe that the problem is more acute here than in most developed countries, because Israel's population and labour force is still relatively young and the proportion of older people and pensioners relatively small. At present, therefore, we can afford to be generous to old-age pensioners (and other beneficiaries of social insurance) without having to shoulder heavy contributions. If we stop accumulating reserves, we still reduce insurance rates.

But the situation is likely to affect our GNP and the change dramatically within the next two decades or so. In 1960-61, recipurposes. Superfluous strike threat

THE case with which Mr. Allon was yesterday able to persuade the Histadrut Teachers Union to call off their threatened strike appears to confirm what most insiders felt all along — that the Union's strike threat was never serious.

This does not imply that a strike was never possible. Even when a threat starts out as less than serious, clumsy moves by the bargaining parties can bring on even an unwanted strike. In this case, Mr. Allon and his Ministry a i d e s manocuvred deftly to cool rather than aggravate the Union's feelings.

Yet if the strike threat was not serious from the start only three members of the Union's central committee sup-ported a walkout yesterday— why was it made? Nothing tan-gible was at stake which the teachers succeeded in obtaining by their agreement not to strike. All they managed to achieve was to irk parents and demonstrate their readiness to misuse what should be an ultimate

Union Secretary Shalom Levin has consistently argued that Israel's teachers are more than an interest group concerned only with their wages. They have a paramount role to play in de-termining education policy, in maintaining professional stand-ards, and in upholding the quality of the classroom. This also means that the Union can, if it chooses, use the device of a strike to realize such professional goals. While this understanding of the Union's role has its merits, it also leads to the kind of crisis or pseudo-crisis that we witnessed this week, namely wielding the threat of sanctions where it has no justification.

For the question of crowded classes is a national issue that must be addressed within the wide framework of national goals and available resources.

No interest group, nor any professional group, can lay spe-cial claim to it, just as none of those involved can ignore it.

Undoubtedly, however, the Union leaders were subject to pressures from the membership. Teaching oversized classes is a great burden on the best of lives in that suburb. These are well-known facts, part of the Israel city scene. Hooliganism is rampant in the streets.

Personally, I am not worried. I live in a southern quarter of Tel Aviv. My daughter, aged 12, threw a party the other day, and it did not even occur to us to worry about hooligans. The hooligans ride to the northern part of ride to the northern part of Tel Aviv in the evening, to break up parties taking place there, while in the southern part of the city, there is law and order. Saturday nights it is much more pleasant to stroli in the main street of the Hatikva Quarter than in Dizengoff. As a matter of fact it is quite impossible to walk at all in Rehov Dizengoff. One of these days someone is going to push someone else into the Dizengoff garbage heap, and the poor fellow will va-nish without a trace.

In other words, it is not TV which is consider a consider the control of the contr causing a crisis in our cul-tural life and in show business but the very fact that the cultured public is avoiding the street.

However much we worry about the spread of organized crime, we ought to worry even more about the unorganized variety. A 12-year-old lad steals a car aerial, a boy of 14 smashes the windowpanes at his school, an 18-year-old teen ager pinches every female bottom within reach while his pal starts a riot at the cinema — they all are damaging the quality of our life more than the Mafia would. They are playing a Western, and in a Western, as we all know, the street belongs to the tough. Peaceful citizens stay at home and draw the shutters.

In this way rowdyism turns a Mediterranean open society, which in the past had spread out in all directions, met at different levels, merged at a multitude of contact points, into an isolationist Western society, selfish, introverted and also hostile.

IN the 'fifties, someone coined an apt phrase which left a deep imprint on the nation's collective consciousness: "the Second Israel." It referred to those who did not live in the cities, but in neighbourhoods; did not sit in Dizengoff cafes, but on stools in front of their houses; did not go to the cinema, but stayed within their four walls. The Second Israel did not understand the language of the street, did not fall in with the majority's way of life. The Second Israel curled up round itself, created patterns of behaviour all for itself, and refused to note what was going on out-

Nowadays, only a genera-tion later, we are witnessing a similar phenomenon. Except that now we are not dealing with new immigrants. Rather, we are referring to the old-timers, the sons of the First Israel. The affluent and edu-cated stratum of Israel society. cated stratum of Israel society

NO FANFARE FOR FEDERATION'S ANNIVERSARY

THE first anniversary of the loose federation between Egypt, Syria and Libya will be observed in the three countries today, evidently minus the fanfare about the "revolutionary" moves made by them "on the road of victory."

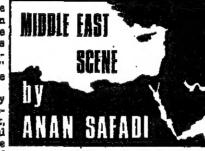

The day is to be marked by an anniversary speech by Egyp-tian President Anwar Sadat, head of the federal presidential council. It will be carried live over the Cairo, Damascus and Tripoli radio networks, In addition, a number of political meetings have been summoned in Cairo for no particular reason save that the three federated states were coordinating their policies closely.

The absence of fanfare on the occasion which also marks the third anniversary of Libya's revolution against the monarchy, was officially attributed to the loss of one member of Libya's ruling Revolutionary Command Council last month. The truth seems to be that the three states appear to find themselves at such political odds that the federation is an empty last vestige of bonds between them. Yet Mr. Sadat can be expected to claim the contrary today.

In addition to vast differences in internal political structure, the three states are presently at odds over some major issues. Syria is currently in conflict with Egypt over the general question of Arab-Soviet relations following Cairo's ouster of the Russian military advisers last July. Libya sides with Egypt on this issue but differs with Cairo in its approach to the Middle East con-flict generally. The Egyptians are currently seeking political debate, in contrast to Tripol's advocacy of armed struggle, in-cluding terrorism as a substitute
